

Brexit: For Companies and Banks, The Worst is Yet to Come

September 4, 2019
Executive Summary:

For European companies and banks, Brexit is like a looming hurricane, the severity of which remains uncertain.

Companies in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are battenning down the hatches, fearing that although they've already felt the first effects, the storm itself has not yet made landfall.

Meanwhile, U.K. banks are bracing for the onset of what could be long-term headwinds brought on by the event, which many continue to be described as a selfinflicted injury—at least from an economic point of view—while others see it as an opportunity.

This report is not trying to predict the upsides and downsides of Brexit—too many economic analysts and pundits have gotten it wrong in the recent past already. What it does want to reflect, though, is the current sentiment of large corporates in the U.K. as well as on the Continent, also including the impact Brexit is having on the relationship with their banks.

You are invited to our Brexit Webinar September 18, 2019 Webinar with Tobias Miarka and Thomas Jacques.

The data contained in the Document is based upon a particular bank's scope, which reflects a bank's data submission, business structure, and sales revenue Reporting methodology. As a result, any data contained in the Document may not be directly comparable to data presented to another bank. For franchise benchmarking, Crisil Coalition Greenwich has implemented equal ranking logic on aggregate results i.e., when sales revenues are within 5% of at least one competitor ahead, a tie is shown and designated by = (where actual ranks are shown). Entity level data has no equal ranking logic implemented and therefore, on occasion, the differences between rank bands can be very close mathematically.

The data in this Document may reflect the views reported to Crisil Coalition Greenwich by the research participants. Interviewees may be asked about their use of and demand for financial products and services and about investment practices in relevant financial markets.
