

Cloud Computing for the Buy Side: Moving Beyond the Myths

May 14, 2014

Executive Summary:

Cloud computing applications, like vendor-hosted execution management systems (EMS) and Software as a Service (SaaS), are common on Wall St., but most finance firms are underutilizing this resource and its potential competitive advantage.

Concerns about security and compliance have been addressed, and with IT budgets on the wane, corporate culture barriers can be trumped by economic realities.

While the cost of replacing legacy infrastructure is often prohibitive, hedge funds in particular may benefit from adopting cloud on an as-needed basis. This strategy can reduce the cost of trading twofold—by reducing infrastructure spend and reducing costs outside of the bid/ask spread.

Methodology:

This Greenwich Associates study is based on interviews done in September 2013 discussing technology usage and spending with 486 head traders at buy-side institutions around the globe trading equity, fixed-income and foreign-exchange products.

In the first quarter of 2014, conversations were also conducted with several cloud-computing service providers and buy-side technology professionals to understand in more detail market concerns related to cloud computing and the steps being taken by service providers to ease them.

As a result, any data contained in the Document may not be directly comparable to data presented to another bank. For franchise benchmarking, Crisil Coalition Greenwich has implemented equal ranking logic on aggregate results i.e., when sales revenues are within 5% of at least one competitor ahead, a tie is shown and designated by = (where actual ranks are shown). Entity level data has no equal ranking logic implemented and therefore, on occasion, the differences between rank bands can be very close mathematically.
