

Customer Experience Programs: More than the Metric

April 19, 2016

Executive Summary:

Companies today have access to a broad array of tools for measuring and improving customer loyalty. In fact, picking from among the many proprietary customer experience management (CEM) approaches marketed by consultants and other providers can be dizzying.

Indeed metrics such as Net Promoter Score or measures of Customer Commitment offer useful data about customer experience. But executives charged with building and implementing CEM programs that demonstrate clear Return on Investment (ROI) should keep one critical point in mind: Regardless of the metric or measure used, the ultimate success of a program in driving positive change will be determined not by the specific tool employed, but rather by management's success at integrating CEM into the organization.

That message is often lost amid sales pitches from outside CEM providers touting the advantages of their own particular methodologies. So it is important that companies looking to implement or upgrade CEM programs not get distracted from their ultimate goal: increasing profitability through changes to the corporate culture that make customers more loyal.

This Greenwich Report explains how companies can use the SMART Principles to devise, implement and maintain an organizational process that uses CEM to drive real cultural change to improve the customer experience.

The data contained in the Document is based upon a particular bank's scope, which reflects a bank's data submission, business structure, and sales revenue Reporting methodology. As a result, any data contained in the Document may not be directly comparable to data presented to another bank. For franchise benchmarking, Crisil Coalition Greenwich has implemented equal ranking logic on aggregate results i.e., when sales revenues are within 5% of at least one competitor ahead, a tie is shown and designated by = (where actual ranks are shown). Entity level data has no equal ranking logic implemented and therefore, on occasion, the differences between rank bands can be very close mathematically.

The data in this Document may reflect the views reported to Crisil Coalition Greenwich by the research participants. Interviewees may be asked about their use of and demand for financial products and services and about investment practices in relevant financial markets. Crisil Coalition Greenwich compiles the data received, conducts statistical analysis and reviews for presentation purposes to produce the final results.
