

A Flash Crash, or Just Volatility?

October 11, 2016

I wish we could get away from calling every bout of extreme price volatility a flash crash. Markets crash and rebound - they always have. Today it can happen in a few minutes, back in the 80's it would take a few days. But the causes are often the same.

The same can be said for price volatility. And volatility is something market participant revenues could use more of these days. So while the recent GBP overnight price movements are notable, I don't believe they are a cause for panic. In fact, the more often we have market moves like this, the better market makers and their algos will become at handling (and profiting from) them.

And profiting from them is not a bad thing. It is the potential for profit that keeps market makers of all stripes in the market. Therefore, natural market forces should see many of these short lived price shocks flatten out overtime.

I spoke with Bloomberg TV about this, and why, despite the limited need for alarm, the market should still work to understand how they events occur and how to get better at managing them in the future.

The data contained in the Document is based upon a particular bank's scope, which reflects a bank's data submission, business structure, and sales revenue Reporting methodology. As a result, any data contained in the Document may not be directly comparable to data presented to another bank. For franchise benchmarking, Crisil Coalition Greenwich has implemented equal ranking logic on aggregate results i.e., when sales revenues are within 5% of at least one competitor ahead, a tie is shown and designated by = (where actual ranks are shown). Entity level data has no equal ranking logic implemented and therefore, on occasion, the differences between rank bands can be very close mathematically.

The data in this Document may reflect the views reported to Crisil Coalition Greenwich by the research participants. Interviewees may be asked about their use of and demand for financial products and services and about investment practices in relevant financial markets. Crisil Coalition Greenwich compiles the data received, conducts statistical analysis and reviews for presentation purposes to produce the final results.
