

Innovations Ease Corporate Bond Trading

May 9, 2017

Executive Summary:

Trading corporate bonds is finally getting a little easier. No, we are not going back to the good old days, nor are the Trump administration's promises to scale back financial regulations—and the Volcker Rule in particular—driving banks to take on large bond positions again. What we are seeing, however, is an adaptation to the current market structure and with that, a smaller but much more efficient buy-side trading desk.

Two-thirds of the investors we spoke with believe that executing corporate bond orders of $1 million in notional size or less is now easy, up from 56% the year before. Corporate bond execution venues and offerings that were a mere idea a few years ago are finally consolidating and starting to bear fruit. Meanwhile, the quantity of data available has grown, along with the number and quality of tools to analyze and action the data.

The data contained in the Document is based upon a particular bank's scope, which reflects a bank's data submission, business structure, and sales revenue Reporting methodology. As a result, any data contained in the Document may not be directly comparable to data presented to another bank. For franchise benchmarking, Crisil Coalition Greenwich has implemented equal ranking logic on aggregate results i.e., when sales revenues are within 5% of at least one competitor ahead, a tie is shown and designated by = (where actual ranks are shown). Entity level data has no equal ranking logic implemented and therefore, on occasion, the differences between rank bands can be very close mathematically.

The data in this Document may reflect the views reported to Crisil Coalition Greenwich by the research participants. Interviewees may be asked about their use of and demand for financial products and services and about investment practices in relevant financial markets. Crisil Coalition Greenwich compiles the data received, conducts statistical analysis and reviews for presentation purposes to produce the final results.
