

Long-Term Investors Embrace FX Algos

June 14, 2017

Executive Summary:

Execution algorithms have become popular for foreign-exchange (FX) trading in recent years, driven by strong uptake among hedge funds, market makers and speculators. Not wanting to be left out of this trading technology arms race, Greenwich Associates is seeing increased algo usage by long-term investors and corporate end users. For these traders, algorithms are sophisticated tools that allow them to intelligently access multiple liquidity sources, reduce information leakage and improve trading performance.

FX investors have long had the ability to access their market directly via electronic channels, with most trades routed to and matched on multi-dealer platforms. Despite the market's heavily electronic nature, however, automation via trading algorithms has until now been limited. While dealer relationships remain important—given the research, credit and other non-execution services they provide—longer-term investors are demanding a level of increased control and transparency into the trading process that only automation brings.

Catalyzed by a growing focus on best execution, long-term investors are increasingly turning to algos and transaction cost analysis (TCA) to optimize their trading performance.

Methodology:

From June through August 2016, Greenwich Associates interviewed 78 buy-side foreign-exchange traders across the globe to learn more about trading desk budget allocations, trader staffing levels, OMS/EMS/TCA platform usage, and the impact of market structure changes on the sector.

Between August and November 2016, Greenwich Associates interviewed 2,400 users of foreign-exchange services across the Americas, Europe and Asia Pacific.

For franchise benchmarking, Crisil Coalition Greenwich has implemented equal ranking logic on aggregate results i.e., when sales revenues are within 5% of at least one competitor ahead, a tie is shown and designated by = (where actual ranks are shown). Entity level data has no equal ranking logic implemented and therefore, on occasion, the differences between rank bands can be very close mathematically.
